

THE DROWNED ROAD

The causeway to Saint Ferrant runs three miles over tidal flats and is walkable for four hours either side of low water. Pilgrims who misjudge the tide are found in the reeds a week later.

The Bell House stands at the causeway's landward end. Its keeper, Ovid Sarn, rings the tide bell twice a day and has not slept indoors since the winter his brother drowned.

THE LANTERN CHAPEL

Halfway across, a chapel of black stone sits on the only rock above the waterline. Its lamp is lit by nobody the villagers will name.

Beneath the chapel floor is a flooded crypt holding the reliquary of Saint Ferrant, which the tide uncovers once a year.
